Aurianna Angelique is a social activist, community leader and youth advocate in Los Angeles, California. Angelique is also known as the founder the Los Angeles social empowerment non-profit organization, R.O.C ERA, which Angelique created to change community and the social inequities, that people of color face because of systemic and structural racism. R.O.C ERA focuses on building disadvantaged Black and Latino communities starting with our children and youth.

As founder of R.O.C ERA, Angelique's mission is to empower the youth through leadership and youth civic engagement. As a role model to children in the community, Angelique models health and wellness and has created program curriculums focusing on physical, mental, and emotional holistic health. R.O.C ERA believes that by creating strong and healthy children you create strong and healthy communities.

As a social activist, Angelique strives to give voices to communities that are often unheard. R.O.C. ERA's youth civic impact programs, uses fine arts to bring awareness to social inequalities. A recent live production performed by the ROC KIDZ of Urban Annie, a spin of the old motion picture Annie, is raising awareness on the broken foster care systems and its affects on Black and Latino children and youth today.

Through her organization, Angelique also serves as a legal activist and advocate helping families of color reunify with their children. While also focusing on solutions of policy and system reform, to address the broken family, juvenile, and child welfare systems, Angelique stands beside R.O.C. ERA's team of dynamic community members, activists, and leaders, who look like the communities they serve. These powerful people of color are community members who volunteer their time to positively impact the communities they live in. Striving for change and believing that regardless of color, children and communities should all have the equal opportunity to be healthy and thriving.
